Onto Your Questions and Comments

We're a non-US school that relies on medical school faculty for some of our MSc degree programs.

I suspect other schools may have issues with counting these faculty, especially those with a little different context of 100%, 12 month appointments. Here each faculty member is evaluated annually on teaching/training activities, so our school provides the population scientists in medicine with an opportunity to be involved in teaching that meets their professional/career needs. We have only one medicine faculty member we pay at a 40% level, and the rest are pro bono with the teaching responsibility usually negotiated at hire and the exchange of activities considered a professional courtesy.

As the med school has some students in our MPH programs, they see us as their population level training arm and in return they pick up some teaching. As we have grown, there is much less reliance on faculty from medicine - but for a couple MSc programs, the overlaps seem appropriate based on content.

My sense is that if this requirement stands, we would need to move to creating embedded certificates within other degrees to serve this community.

Onto Your Questions and Comments

I submitted suggested edits for the MPH foundational knowledge area:

“12. Explain a One-Health, ecological perspective...”

and the MPH competency list:

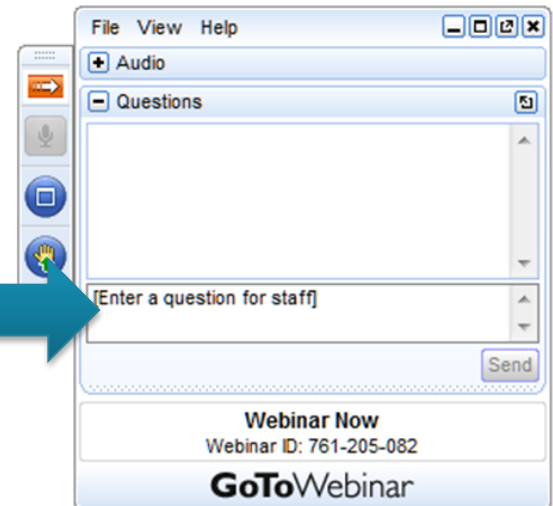

“19. Perform effectively on interprofessional teams.”

Curious to see changes here.
